

University of Utah building new medical center in Daybreak

Last Update: 7/27 5:37 pm

SOUTH JORDAN, Utah (ABC 4 News) - A new medical facility is being built in South Salt Lake County. It's part of the University of Utah system.

The new 208,000 square foot facility will be built in the Daybreak community in South Jordan.

The health center will include everything from primary and specialty care to an emergency center.

Dr. Susan Terry, with the University of Utah Health Care said, "We're hoping to focus on healthy communities where we promote health instead of just treat disease."

The facility is near the south Trax station so patients and staff can ride the rails to the main University of Utah Hospital if they need to.

The new facility will open in the fall of 2011.